LONDON, England -- A statue depicting Prince Harry as a symbolic fallen war hero clutching a locket of his late mother Princess Diana is to go on display next week.

Prince Harry is shown clutching a bloodied flag of Wales and holding a locket of his late mother, Princess Diana.

Artist Daniel Edwards said the memorial was intended to honor those willing but unable to serve in the Iraq conflict.

Harry, who is third in line to the British throne, was set to be deployed to Iraq but due to "specific threats to kill or kidnap him," he remained in England.

The memorial, featuring Harry laid out before the Union Flag with pennies placed over his eyes and his head rested on the bible, will go on show in central London next Thursday as part of the Bridge Art Fair.

Prince Harry is shown holding a bloodied flag of Wales while a desert vulture perches on his boot. Harry's head is earless, denoting the threats against him from militia leaders saying they planned to send him back to his grandmother, Queen Elizabeth II, "without his ears."

A bronze casting of Prince Harry's "severed ears" also set for display at the Trafalgar Hotel will be offered on eBay.

Harry had vowed to leave the army if he was left behind while his regiment was sent to a war zone. Edwards, who is based in New York, said: "Prince Harry's spirit must have died the day they told him he couldn't serve. "That's what this memorial is about."
